On July 15, the studio closed down after it discovered a number of people connected to the facility tested positive. The number of cases at that time was not released.

Since then, staff at the facility have been busy contacting everyone who attended a series of training classes between July 6 and 13, saying they may have been exposed to contagious individuals.

There are no recovered cases connected to this outbreak so far.

In an earlier interview with CTV News, RIDE said its Calgary location was following strict safety protocols, including three metres of spacing between bikes as well as improved disinfection protocols and physical distancing.
